By Jibrán Khan The Congressional Budget Office (CBO) released a report about the estimated costs of implementing Medicare for All. The report states that Medicare for All would reduce long-term costs and that it would expand coverage without costing the government any additional money. While it is true that Medicare for All would help to lower long-term costs, some people are worried that Medicare for All will not be able to cover everyone. The CBO estimates that over the next decade, Medicare for All would add $32.6 trillion to federal spending. This is a full $2.2 trillion more than the current level of spending. In total, the CBO estimated that Medicare for All would cost $32.6 trillion. They also projected that by 2029, Medicare for All would cover about 116 million people, covering 22% of the population. It is interesting to note that this 22% figure is lower than the percentage of Americans that are currently covered by private insurance. People Are Objecting to Medicare for All The report has stirred up a lot of debate. Some people are worried that Medicare for All will not be able to pay for everyone. Some people worry that it will not be possible to effectively implement Medicare for All. Some people feel that Medicare for All will help increase healthcare spending. The CBO report found that by 2029, Medicare for All would reduce the national deficit by $3.1 trillion. The CBO estimated that by 2029, it would cost $32.6 trillion. By 2029, it would be the largest expenditure in the federal budget. The CBO report came out as the Democratic candidates are beginning to debate healthcare policy. The candidates have mostly been talking about lowering long-term costs. Some people have pointed out that Medicare for All would cost more than $32.6 trillion. Another important point is that the CBO report shows that Medicare for All would actually help to lower long-term costs. Medicare for All is estimated to save $2.2 trillion over a decade, and it would reduce the national deficit by $3.1 trillion. Medicare for All would have substantial long-term savings, which would be worth it.
